Introduction to Machine Learning

Machine learning builds a model from training data instead of following hand written rules. Supervised learning uses labelled training data for classification and regression.

Clustering is an unsupervised method that groups similar records without labels. A neural network is a model made of layers of connected units, and overfitting happens when a model memorises its training data.

A recommendation system is a common application of machine learning, and artificial intelligence research also studies heuristic search and knowledge representation.